Health centre in Nacuta village where displaced people and the host community receive special fortified foods from WFP to help treat moderate and acute malnutrition. Cabo Delgado has the second highest rate of chronic malnutrition in the country -- more than half of the children under 5 are chronically malnourished (53% compared to the national average of 43%). Any additional shocks could rapidly worsen the situation especially for women and children.

“We tried to sleep, while people were screaming at the house next door. I couldn't even walk, I was so weak, that's when I noticed that the neighbor's house was burning. Our house was built from bamboo, without clay on the walls, and we managed to tear a hole in the wall and escape. But my daughter was left behind alone, my husband had to pull her out and finally we made it, and we had to hide in the bush for seven days.”

"The owner of the house where we are staying has a television so, to trick the stomachs of my children, they watch TV to distract them from hunger...when they watch they forget their hunger. They have gotten used to it, there is no other way. We left many things behind ... Here we depend on people's kindness..."
